

Vasalgel Update

Vasalgel funding boosted by $200K grant from MCI

Revolution Contraceptives received a $200,000 grant from the Male Contraceptive Initiative (MCI) to advance Vasalgel towards human trials. The grant will support preclinical studies that will evaluate contraceptive effectiveness, procedural simplicity, reversibility, and safety. This proof-of-concept study will build on results from earlier preclinical studies and should support a future application for clinical trials in men.

“MCI’s generous support will increase our ability to provide men with a revolutionary new birth control option,” said Revolution Contraceptives CEO Edward Gillis.

Announcing the new Revolution Contraceptives website!

As you probably know, Parsemus Foundation began working on a new male contraceptive called Vasalgel a number of years ago. In 2013, Revolution Contraceptives was formed as a social venture company to develop Vasalgel and bring it to market.

The organization has grown over the last couple of years to meet the increasingly diverse and complex demands related to moving a product through the R&D and preclinical pipeline toward human clinical trials.

To better serve the increasing number of people who are interested in Vasalgel, Revolution Contraceptives now has its own website:

While the Parsemus website will include Vasalgel as one of its main programs – and donors can continue to contribute to Vasalgel through the Parsemus Foundation – most of the information on Vasalgel is now on the Revolution
